

VICTOR VERSTER

TTS STUDENT: 2001-2008

Current role: E-learning Designer, LEO

Career pathway:

I completed my BA in English Language and Linguistics at the University of Brighton before attaining the NCTJ diploma in Multimedia Journalism at Brighton Journalist Works, a media training company. I now work as an e-learning designer for LEO. We produce bespoke training solutions for an array of international clients.

Advice for students:

I strongly recommend entering the learning technologies sector. Online training is a burgeoning industry that has seen major investment in the last few years - and the industry only looks set to grow further. There is therefore significant scope for career progression and increased potential for financial reward when compared to other industries. Interpersonal skills are particularly important, as you'd be working with diverse groups of people often spread across different locations in the world.

Plans for the future:

I want to continue to produce high-quality e-learning for my company's clients. Long-term, I am enthused by the prospect of becoming an e-learning design consultant, though wish to remain flexible in the face of emerging opportunities.

Best memory of your time at Thomas Telford? Receiving my results on A level results, and seeing the joy on my pals' faces as we realised all our hard work had paid off. The chocolate croissants were also a delight!
